MARTINE OPPOSES TEST ON WHISKY AND WINS POINT

Knocks Out Plan to Spend $5,000 for Coloring Search.

Senator Martine of New Jersey, in a burst of eloquence in the Senate late yesterday afternoon, while the agricultural bill was under consideration, indignantly protested against a proposed amendment to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to expend $5,000 for the Marsh test for detecting artificial coloring matter in whisky.

Largely as the result of his eloquent outburst, the amendment was rejected. What difference did it make, demanded the New Jersey Senator, if good whisky did have a little coloring in it.

Besides, there was New Jersey appledack.

Declared Sheer Waste. Decrying the amendment as sheer waste, Senator Martine said: "Mr. President, I will say-not in the ense of a man experienced in the matter of the color of whisky-that it seems to me the amendment involves a sheer waste. It would seem to me that an examination as to whether liquor was pure or not would establish well enough whather there was coloring matter in it or not. And, pray God, what difference is there if there is a little coloring matter in it? What difference does it make, if the whisky is good—and generally whisky is pronounced good. "To those of the Senate who may be in doubt as to the color of whisky. I say: Come to the glorious Commonwealth of New Jersey, where they brew rivers of an elixir known as appliable." rivers of an elixir known as applejack. Whether colored or otherwise, it is rich in aroma, delirious as an intoxicant. in aroma, delirious as an intoxicant romoting happiness, health, and longev romoting happiness, health, and longevity. This being so, I hold it to be a crime to squander the people's money only to establish a color. Why, Mr. President, after a couple of drinks of New Jersey liquor they would not be able to detect that there were colors in a rainbow. But, Mr. President, dismiss this question, and on the adjournment I invite you to come to New ment I invite you to come to New Jersey and see, taste, and test for yourself. Come!"

Killed the Amendment. On hearing this the Senate could not Northern men dwelt on the value of the buffalo overcoat, and Southern men showed their fondness for the coonskin cap. The provision wanted by Senator Crawford was allowed.

In the course of objections to salary increases, Senator Heyburn shied a increases, Senator Heyburn shied a brick at Solicitor McCabe, without mentioning him. He was discussing the unwisdom of having a lot of law clerks in the Department of Agriculture. He said they should be a part of the Department of Justice, and added:

"There has been a fictitious government built up within this department that has caused something of a scandal, where they have undertaken to usurp the powers of the United States attorney and the United States courts."

Next thing he did was to borrow an inkstand and a pen, and begin writing leters and things in the parlor—a thing I never saw him do before. In fact, there were so few visitors of his own class that the parlor was not entered by anyone but myself more than once in two months. He took all his queer visitors to the study.

When he had finished writing he told messenger boy. When the messenger came Mr. Bellair gave him two letters, with very particular instructions, which I remember clearly.

Appeal to Be Taken In Brandt's Case

NEW YORK, May 16 .- J. W. Bryan, lawyer for Folke E. Brandt, the former lawyer for Folke E. Brandt, the former valet of Mortimer L. Schiff, took the first step today to carry the convict's case to the court of appeals. Mirabeau I. Towns, chief counsel for Brandt, was out of town. After consulting with Justice Ingraham, of the appellate division, regarding the form of the order to be obtained. Bryan called Towns on the long distance telephone and discussed the points to be covered in the appeal. It had been planned to take up the matter at the appellate division, this afternoon, but on account of Towns' absence it was decided to costnote the whole matter until the rame time tomorrow.

THE TIMES' DAILY SERIAL STORY.

"Behind the Curtain"

CHARLES STEPHENS (Copyright, The Frank A. Munsey Co.)

William Gettys, while living with his eccentric friend, Marcus Bellair, undergoes several strange experiences. Once he believes himself to be a man named Arthur Tremlett, about to drown himself in the East River. At another time he watches a German planist, who said that he could not play a tune by ear, under the influence of Marcus Ballair, play with the ease of a master and then die of heart failure. After that Gettys leaves the house and sails for the West Indes. Detective Sergeant Remmers recounts some remarkable instances of Bellair's wonderful powers of insight. He tells of his prevention of Arthur Tremlett's suicide, and of Tremlett's amazement later at meeting in a hotel lobby a man named Robert Ford of Trinidad in the British West Indies. It is Ford, Remmers relates, who is brought to headquarters a few days later a hopeless lunatic, charged with the murder of Marcus Bellair.

Mrs. Rosalle Ford tells her story of the supposed death of Arthur Tremlett and of meeting his double in a New York hotel. She tells also of an invitation from Bellair to her husband, to visit the former's home and of her husband's arrest for Bellair's murder.

Arthur Tremlett tells how he escaped home and of her husband's arrest for Bellair's murder. Arthur Tremleit tells how he escaped death after his fall in the cave; of his life of horror in the cave; of his escape and loss of memory and of his meeting with Bellair in New York. Then he meets Robert Ford and his wife, the latter the sirl he had loved.

girl he had loved. CHAPTER IX.

Mrs. Anselm Concludes.

T was Monday, sir-the day after Mr. Gettys left the house, and the same day he sent for his trunks. Mr. Bellair was very strange all day. By that I mean his appearance was strange and his manner queer. He wandered about the house, not distracted, but like a man who is wondering what to do when he has nothing to do, except something he is not particular and at the foot he tapped me on the shoulder and placed a key on the coffee tray. about doing. Sometimes he would sigh heavily and stop unexpectedly with his hands behind his back. Once he came to a halt right in front of me as I met him in the hall, and looked steadily into my face.

"Yes, sir," I said. "Is there anything you wish?' At that he gave a start and looked very silly. "I beg your pardon, Mrs. Anselm," he said. "I did not see you. I must have been thinking deeply."

He must have been, as you say, sir. I don't see what you are smiling about. proposed amendment with both feet. It was kicked out unceremoniously.

Before Senator Martine, Senator Nelson of Minnesota, too, had objected to the amendment. "You can always tell whether a man has taken whisky whether a man has taken whisky

Then Mr. Bellair took to wandering about the house again. I noticed that he did not go near the study, which was greatly of Agriculture from submitting about the house again. I noticed that he did not go near the study, which was greatly of Agriculture from submitting about the house again. I noticed that he did not go near the study, which was odd in him, for he usually spent between meals there. Instead, he went into every corner of the house, and I think I heard him talking to himself. I beg your pardon? Oh: If I only think I heard him talking to himself. I beg your pardon? Oh: If I only think I heard him talking to himself. I beg your pardon? Oh: If I only think I heard him talking to himself. I beg your pardon? Oh: If I only think I heard him talking to himself, it is hardly likely that I heard what he was saying, is it? Sometimes he stood before a picture on the wall and looked at it for ten or fifteen minutes. No partial partners of a plea by Senator Crawford for a small appropriation to buy a parcel of land adjacent to Wind buy a parc which was queer in Mr. Bellair—a man that was never in the least concelted, neat.

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon he asked me if I had any note paper. At that I began to think he was not right in his head. All his writing was done in his study, and I should think he had plenty of paper and envelopes there. However, I gave him what he wanted. Next thing he did was to borrow an ink-when he had finished writing he told me to call a messenger boy. When the messenger came Mr. Bellair gave him two letters, with very particular instructions, which I remember clearly. One of the letters the messenger was to deliver at once; the other was not to be delivered until after 7 o'clock that evening.

"Isten to where you sit!"

"Listen to my they said, as we though, maybe, act.) "Listen to my they said, as we though, maybe, act.) "Listen to my they said, as we have the said."

I remember seeing the boy look at the I remember seeing the boy look at the addresses and suddenly grin all over. "All right, boss," said he. "You leave it to Casey." That's what he said, sir. "The one to the mister goes right away, and the one to the missus after 7." I remember Mr. Bellair was half angry, but he began to laugh all at once. If it had been me I would have cuffed him out of the place—meaning the boy, of course. But the master just laughed. of course. But the master just laughed, and said it was nothing like that; and to make sure there would be no mistake he took one of the letters back and marked the instruction on the top of the envelope.

When the boy was gone the master took to wandering again. But still he did not go near the study. I'm sure the place must have given him a turn. And I don't blame him, poor man. About 6:30 o'clock in the evening he came downstairs and asked me to prepare supper for two. It was short notice, considering that, Mr. Gettys being gone, I had not expected more than one; but he was very nice about it. After he had arranged about supper he talked about one thing and another in a kind of one thing and another in a kind of friendly way that was new to him.

"Mrs. Anselm," he said, "you are a very estimable woman." Yes, sir, that is what he said. "And I am very sorry that you and I should be about to part company."

This rather, took me aback, for, although it had been in my mind. I hadn't as yet said a word about leaving. Maybe the poor man had a presentiment. I mean about death. Anyhow, I put him off by saying that I would have to hurry if supper was to be ready by 7 o'clock. At that he took to wandering about the house again.

At that he took to wandering about the house again.

The gentleman he had told me was coming arrived promptly at 7 o'clock. He sent up his card, which met Mr. Bellair coming down the stairs. The hame on the card was "Robert Ford," and ther's was something in a foreign language in the corner. When Mr. Bellair leoked at it he changed all at once. You never would have known it was the same moody man when he ran down in the hall to meet Mr. Ford, The genin the hall to meet Mr. Ford. The gen-tleman was a lift stiff, I thought; but

"Mr. Gettys recalled you, Mr. Ford," sald he, "And then I have a personal acquaintance with Lord Dunmiayne, whom you, of course, recall."

I remember that speech, sir, because Mr. Bellair said it two or three times. Mr. Ford looked terribly upset and said he didn't recall Mr. Gettys, and had never had the pleasure of meeting Lord Dunfillayne. It was beyond me, and I think it was heyond the gentleman, too. For as soon as he found his tongee and began to talk freely Mr. Bellair would come back to the rame thing, or to something else that set the visitor all nervous again.

I was glad when supper was over, but you could have knocked me down with a feather when the master said;

"Mrs. Anselm, Mr. Ford and I will have coffee in the Red Room, if you please."

That's what he called the private.

That's what he called the private study, and aside from the fact that I thought he would never enter that room again, it was the first time he had asked me into it. However, it was none f my business. There was nothing unusual about the room, as far as I could see, when I went in with the coffee. There was a bit curtained off with red hangings, and up against the escritoire there was a telephone switchboard. There was the piano, too. Mr. Ford was sitting in a comfortable chair near the telephone business. Next moment I heard the door of the study shut, and I heard the snap of the Inside lock. I put my tray on the hat rack in the hall and sat down in a chair.
